Best stovetop pressure cooker

Fagor Duo 10-Quart Stovetop Pressure Cooker

Who should buy it: Experienced cooks or novices who plan on doing a lot of pressure cooking.

Who's it for: Those who value durability, quality, and those who want to pressure cook large meals without having to lug out a countertop appliance.

How much will it cost: $130 on Amazon

Why we picked the Fagor Duo 10-

Quart: This stovetop pressure cooker is incredibly durable, made of 18/10 stainless steel. It's very difficult to dent, knick, or damage this pot, and when you pick it up, you can feel the quality of the material. When it comes to pressure cookers, size matters. Both the 8-quart and 10-quart models give you plenty of room to cook large foods, like roasts. You can also use this pressure cooker on any heat source — gas, electric, or even induction.

The features on this stovetop cooker make it so you get the benefits of an electric cooker, and the control and longevity of a stovetop cooker. It has a brightly colored pressure indicator, so you can easily see when the pot reaches full pressure. Unlike the more basic stovetop pressure cookers, Fagor Duo has a dial system. This makes it so you can control and release pressure very easily and accurately.

Of all the pressure cookers we tested, the Fagor Duo was the most durable and reliable. When we prepared a cheesecake in this cooker, we had everything we needed to make a perfect dessert. It cooks very evenly, and it maintains pressure consistently.

When you compare the Fagor Duo to some other stovetop pressure cookers, this cooker is fairly pricey. It's built to last, but you pay for that quality. Therefore, for those who only use a pressure cooker periodically, or those who just want to experiment with pressure cooking, you can get away with buying a cheaper model for under $50.
